MONTANA

It Beckons

Satisfy That Urge

Other states may boast of higher mountains and deeper canyons, but travelers who have roamed the world maintain that there is no other state where nature has so consolidated her wonders and resources and run riot with such abandon as in the Treasure State—this "Land of the Shining Mountains"—flanked to the north and south by the wonderlands of Glacier and Yellowstone National Parks.

In planning that "See America First" trip, this year or next year, failure to include Montana will bring only regret. By its inclusion, your happiness and the success of your tour will be assured.

Although a fine system of well-marked highways, modern cities and travel conveniences of all description have to a large extent replaced the tough old roads and much of the "rough-it and like-it" conditions of the early days, Montana still retains its mountain trails, hidden waterfalls, forests primeval, flashing trout streams, mysterious badlands, and above all the storied hospitality of the Old West.

Here in their native haunts, deer, antelope, moose, elk, buffalo and bear roam at will; the cowboy and Indian may be seen in their natural surroundings at work and play; vast fields of wheat ripple in the breeze; gold, silver, copper, lead, coal, gypsum and other minerals are mined; oil flows from hundreds of wells; fruit trees flourish; beet sugar is produced and refined; pioneers and pioneering are still on the move. It is irresistible, and once you have experienced its thrill, the urge to stay or return will remain with you always.

We Montanans are folksy folks—you'll like us—and we all join in extending to you an old-fashioned western welcome. Come once, and you'll come again.

Cordially yours,

Governor
